

Why Is It Necessary To Abolish Death Penalty

The death penalty has been an issue of debate for many years. In the United States, it is still legal in 31 states, though it is a practice that has come under increased scrutiny in recent years. The death penalty should be abolished for several reasons—it is cruel and unusual punishment, it does not deter crime, and it is expensive to maintain.

The death penalty has long been denounced as a form of cruel and unusual punishment that violates the Eighth Amendment of the US Constitution. This amendment prohibits "cruel and unusual punishments," including those considered barbaric or out of line with the evolving standards of decency in society. The death penalty does not serve any real purpose other than to exact revenge on those who have committed heinous acts, which runs contrary to the fundamental basis of our justice system.

Another reason why the death penalty should be abolished is that there is no evidence that it actually works as a deterrent to crime. Studies have shown that capital punishment does not reduce homicide rates more than alternative punishments such as life imprisonment, which suggests that executing people does not prevent others from committing similar crimes in the future. This indicates that the death penalty may be an unnecessary expense, given its lack of efficacy as a deterrent to crime.

Finally, the cost associated with maintaining capital punishment makes it difficult to justify keeping it in place. Executing someone typically costs much more than imprisoning them for life due to court fees and other associated costs—in some cases, up to 10 times more money per person! This means that states are spending millions of dollars each year on a practice that has little impact on reducing crime rates or increasing public safety.

In conclusion, there are several reasons why the death penalty should be abolished—it violates our constitutional principles of cruelty and unusual punishment, there is no evidence that it deters crime more effectively than alternative punishments such as life imprisonment, and it is expensive to maintain. As such, capital punishment should be done away with entirely in favor of more humane and effective forms of justice.
